授業内容 Course Description	This course aims to provide an overview of both the theory and functioning of international organizations in promoting international cooperation. Why do and did states create international organizations? What is the role of international organizations? How have states "institutionalized" decentralized international society? These are major questions to be explored in this course. In order to find out relevant answers, the course will start with an introduction to the international organizations such as the history of institutionalizing international society and its processes. It will then focus on the United Nations System which involve the following: structure of internal organs like Security Council, humanitarian issues, collective security.
到達目標(授業の狙い) Objectives	This course endeavors to help each participant accomplish, inter alia, the following objectives: 1. Understand the historical origins and structure of the United Nations; 2. Develop skills to analyze the potentials and limitations of international organization in the modern global system; 3. Appreciate the global issues and how the UN try to solve them;
授業方法 Method of Instruction	This course is taught in the form of lectures with PowerPoint slides and a class discussion. Materials on each topic will be distributed on Moodle. Lectures will be based on assigned readings and preliminary considerations of their case studies, which helps to attend in-class discussion.
準備学習 Class Preparation	Students will undertake their own research on simple questions or case studies of international organizations in advance. Therefore, each participant will be required to read the texts below carefully before coming to class. Additional readings are also suggested for students who wish to go further on topics of particular interest.
教科書 Text	Textbooks and materials will be announced later in class.
